Re: Undergraduate Laws degree from the University of London International Programmes

To Whom It May Concern,

Following a series of meetings with University of London representatives and staff both in Pakistan and London on 22 July 2015, I hereby confirm that Themis School of Law is working towards the establishment of an institution providing tuition support for undergraduate law students of the University of London International Programmes.

Furthermore, and with the support of the Undergraduate Laws Programme, Themis School of Law will be applying for recognition under the University of London's Teaching Institutions Recognition Framework. Further information on the Teaching Institutions Recognition Framework may be found on our website here:- <http://www.londoninternational.ac.uk/teaching-institutions>

Although University of London International Programmes qualifications have been designed for independent study, success in preparing University of London students for their examinations has been the foundation on which the reputation of many institutions in the UK and overseas has been developed. Institutions enjoy such benefits as curricula developed by University of London academics; a valuable award from a prestigious university; freedom to set their own fees in the light of local circumstances, and to develop and deliver the method and types of tuition they choose.

We look forward to working with Themis School of Law as they work towards recognition under the University's Teaching Institutions Recognition Framework and the establishment of a programme of support for undergraduate laws students in Karachi.

Yours sincerely,

Rev Simon Askey,
Director, Undergraduate Laws Programme
